

I am strongly against any weakening or overturning of New Jersey's "do not call list" rules. If I want to do business with a company I will contact that company. I don't care how interesting or beneficial that company may think their latest sale, promotion or "deal" is or how much money they think it will save me. If I want to shop for something I will do it myself. I cannot express adequately how much I resent having to stop what I am doing to answer the telephone and be subjected to the 5th sales pitch of the week from the same company about the same topic that I told them I wasn't interested in 4 times already. I do not think my time is less important than their desire to impose on my time. If a person I knew did this to me I would be within my legal rights to press charges for it and if it were an individual (not a company) that I didn't know I could also legally have the calls traced so charges could be pressed. Why would I allow it just because it's a salesperson?
